Last Train To Nibroc

Last Train to Nibroc, the first play of the trilogy, was inspired by Hutton's learning, from a book about S.J. Perelman, that the legendary writers F. Scott Fitzgerald and Nathaniel West, Perelman's brother-in-law, not only died within a day of one another in 1940, but that their corpses may very well have been shipped back for burial to the East Coast on the same train.

Some might overlook Last Train to Nibroc because it sounds like a romance, but that would be a huge mistake. The play is a love story, but it's also about how humble people at an anxious time in American history deal with personal failures, managing the ache of what could have been, while still respecting that life can change in a moment if you're risky enough.
